Trees Need NOT be Hoarded

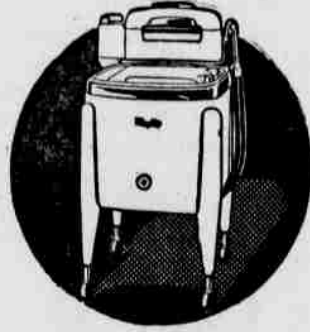

Trees need not be hoarded to be saved for the future. They are the world's largest plants . . . and, like all plants, they reproduce and grow.

The rapidly developing science of forestry has found, in the last few decades, practical ways of harnessing this capacity of nature to replenish and hasten forest growth. Today an increasing number of professional foresters is being employed by the forest industries to put this knowledge to work on the land.

Good forest practice . . . and we use it in our woods . . . makes possible the full use of timber resources today and provides for new trees to grow again for tomorrow.
