THE NEW MR. LINCOLN

NOW THAT President Truman's labor-management conference has exploded with a beautiful bang and the boys have gone back to their favorite pastime of bashing each others brains out, this might be the opportune time to put Mr. Lincoln under the microscope.

Ed Reardon

This is in no way a reference to the Great Emancipator — although he had some pertinent ideas about labor, too. The Mr. Lincoln now under discussion is James F. Lincoln, a gentleman who operates an electrical welding concern in Cleveland, and has been making a pretty good go of it for a considerable number of years.

Mr. Lincoln has a plan on how to run business in a way which is mutually satisfactory to both labor and management. His plan isn't just a theory he has scribbled down on paper and is waiting for someone to try.

It is one which he has tried, himself, and has found practical over a period of years. It is a plan which is so simple, however, that it has the efficiency experts, the economics analysts and the brawn-brained Government statisticians tearing at their hair roots and gnashing their bridgework in angry amazement.

Mr. Lincoln merely pays his employees what they are worth.

THAT ISN'T intended as a witicism. It really is the Lincoln plan in a nutshell. But the idea is so elemental that it has confounded the experts who regard the Cleveland tycoon as a sort of monstrosity, an industrial bogeyman, a guy with a gimmick who will pull the world's economic structure down around their big, red ears if somebody doesn't throw a net over him in a hurry.

They even hustled him off to Washington during the war to let a Senate investigating committee pick and poke at him and threaten him with fines for overpaying his help and warn him that he and his silly ideas would be the ruin of all the wartime industrial regulations if he didn't watch out.

You see, Mr. Lincoln made the mistake of thinking that what this Country really wanted was more production for less money, more employment and less strikes and
