Oregon Sculptors' Work to Stand in Halls of Washington

"The fact that the Oregon territory became a part of the United States by neither purchase nor battle, gives it a unique history," Dr. Burt Brown Barker, chairman of the Oregon Statuary Legislative committee, said in discussing the committee's activities. "As late as 1834 and 1840 the United States congress had no conception of the possibilities of the Oregon country industrially, economically, or politically."

"Settlement was nonchalantly left to England and the United States and in an agreement between the countries it was to belong to whichever country settled it first," Dr. Barker explained.

At that time the Oregon country included all of the state of Washington, Oregon, the western part of British Columbia, Idaho and parts of Wyoming.

"That is the background of why the members of the statuary committee selected Rev. Jason Lee, Methodist missionary to the Oregon country, as a citizen to represent Oregon in Statuary hall in Washington, D. C. After visiting the Oregon country and realizing its possibilities, Lee met with members of congress and urged them to settle this great country," Dr. Barker declared.

Dr. John McLoughlin, a member of the Hudson Bay fur trading company, was selected as the other citizen to represent Oregon in the monumental hall.

A. Philmister Proctor and his son Clifford Proctor, both outstanding sculptors, are visiting in Portland and Salem to work out details of their program in executing the statues of the two Oregon pioneers. They will model their statues from copies of portraits of the two pioneers, painted from photographs taken at the time Rev. Jason Lee and Dr. John McLoughlin lived.

Members of the Oregon Statuary finance committee, responsible for collecting funds to finance the project are Floyd W. Campbell, chairman; Rev. William Wallace Youngson, secretary; Mrs. E. J. English, Dean Webster, Judge Charles W. Redding, and Mrs. Frank Blum.
