Motorlog Fishermen Entranced With Angling in Oregon's Rogue

This is a condensation of a motorlog article appearing in The Sunday Oregonian May 23 which was prepared by The Oregonian in co-operation with the Oregon State Motor association. The article is written as a letter from Al McCready, Oregonian staff writer, and Mrs. McCready to Harley Threesen, a friend, of Chippewa Falls, Wis.

DEAR HARLEY:

Want to feel a 30-pounder yanking on the end of your salmon rod? Want to hear that reel scream? Then head on down to Southwest Oregon when your vacation time comes and see if you can land a scrappy Rogue river chinook salmon.

Although the Rogue country is one of the most primitive areas left in the United States, we found paved roads leading right to the edge of the white water pathway used by Mr. and Mrs. Chinook on their way upstream from the Pacific Coast to their mountain creek spawning grounds.

We made the four-day round trip to Oregon's wild corner in the white travel car of the Oregon State Motor association, found fine accommodations all along the way, fished both the upper and lower Rogue and brought home two tasty chinooks to prove it.

This hard-working angler fought nearly a half hour before landing a 20-pounder, fishing from floating salmon board at Weasku inn, east of Grants Pass, at Savage Rapids dam.

Guide Recommended

Linked with the outside world only by a forest service trail, the middle Rogue country is the home of herds of blacktail deer, wild turkeys, cougars, bobcats and bears. There are tall stands of virgin Douglas fir, redwoods and ponderosa pine, too. But loggers stay away for the same reason hunters do. You can't get in or out of the middle Rogue with much more than you can carry on your back.

But you don't need to be a first cousin to a mountain goat to enjoy the Rogue's incomparable fishing. You can drive within a stone's throw of spots where you can fish for some of the world's fightingest steelhead and salmon.

What makes them that way? A lazy fish couldn't live in the turbulent Rogue, which has its beginnings high in the Cascades near Crater Lake and thunders its way 250 miles downhill to the sea over jagged rocks and through deep canyons.

You'll want a day to drive down the Oregon coast to Gold Beach, the first place we wet our fishing lines in the Rogue. There's plenty to see along U. S. highway 101, which hugs the coastline most of the way.

It's cold out on the river at 5 a. m., and we were glad we wore extra sweaters. Tyro fishermen will do well to find a guide, who will supply a boat, outboard motor, tackle and advice for about $20 a day.

Chinooks keep to the shallows near the banks when they move up the swift Rogue, so we anchored near shore and fished close to the bottom with a single spinner at the end of a piano wire leader. Spring-run salmon average about 22 pounds, and you're in for a real tussle when one of these snags your hook and heads for the fast water in midstream.

If you can stay an extra day in Gold Beach, a trip that shouldn't be missed is the 32-mile ride upriver in the mail boat to Agness. Two veteran rivermen, Lex Fromm and Deforest Sorber, hold the contract to carry the U. S. mail to tiny Agness, which can be reached only by water except in the dry season, when a tortuous, 66-mile logging road south from Coquille becomes passable.

From Gold Beach it's only a five-hour drive around the south end of the Siskiyou forest to Grants Pass, halfway up the Rogue.

A 20-mile side trip at Cave Junction takes the tourist to Oregon Caves, an underground fairyland of vari-colored stalactites and stalagmites which shouldn't be passed by.

Anglers in the Grants Pass vicinity use "salmon boards" to fish for the lordly chinook. These are finger piers supported by floating oil drums anchored out in the stream. The rushing Rogue spins the spinner, and all the fisherman has to do is fasten his rod firmly to the pier and sit on the beach to await developments. When the reel begins to scream and the rod bends double, the fun begins! Once out in the swift current the salmon is boss, and the fisherman may need to jump in a handy rowboat and give chase if he hooks a big one that decides to head for the ocean.

Those who really like to rough it can take the thrilling trip all the way down the Rogue from Grants Pass to the mouth in white water boats manned by veteran rivermen who charge about $150 a head for the trip.

How does it sound, Harley? We'll be looking for you this summer.

Yours, CONNIE AND AL.

News From C. A. Office

With crested wheat grass seed seling from fifty to fifty-five cents a pound and quite difficult to obtain at that price, Morrow county farmers might give some thought to harvesting seed from established fields of this grass on their farms.

Checking for seed sets on several fields through the county, I found that the fields vary considerably in the amount of seed they will yield. However, at the price of seed it is profitable to harvest rather poor fields for seed.

Time for harvest will vary in the county in relation to other crops. Many of the fields in the lower country are ready for harvest this week or will be early next week. The fields in the upper country will be ready in about three weeks.

There is a ready market for this seed and many of the fields will produce from fifteen to thirty dollars per acre of seed.

The crickets are on the march again! The past several days of cooler weather has brought a decided migration of crickets into the wheat crops adjoining the rangeland in northern Morrow county. In fact, several bands have migrated as far south as the Lexington-Jarmon highway for a distance of about nine miles from Butter creek past Sand Hollow.

Adults are beginning to lay eggs now, and according to Harvey Summers, supervisor, bureau of entomology, there is a real threat of crickets for another year. Mr. Summers states that the crickets are moving rapidly toward the Blue mountains where conditions are ideal for them. If they become established in the mountains to build up in numbers there will be a greater threat than ever before. Control methods are far less effective and more costly under mountain conditions.

The bureau of entomology control program under supervision of Harvey Summers has been a very successful one the past season. However, the bureau program has been one of controlling crickets in hatching areas and it is impossible for large scale baiting in crop areas.

Some farmers are baiting crops this week and others have baited during the earlier cricket season when more effective control is possible. Bait and bait spreaders have been available at the mixing station at Boardman during the past several months. Farmers who wish to bait now will have to obtain bait supplies and baiters at the bureau of entomology sheds at Walla Walla as the program is being discontinued this week at Boardman.

Appointment of John C. Campbell as extension rural housing specialist has been announced by F. L. Ballard, associate director of the OSC extension service. Ballard points out that many farmers in the state are either building or planning to build new farm structures. Campbell's work will be concerned with assisting in rural housing activities.

Prior to accepting his new appointment, Campbell was employed by an architect in Everett, Wash. He is a native of Kansas.

With the large wheat crop in prospect many problems in storage are bound to come up. In fact several farmers have called at the office recently to discuss temporary storage and how it may be provided.

Much of our grain will have to be stored on the ground as it now appears. However, before this mode of storage is resorted to, all possibilities of storage in old abandoned houses and other buildings on the farm should be used. Many of these will need reinforcement and careful consideration when filling with grain if they are to hold up under the strain exerted by the grain.

When ground storage is used a level, well drained site should be selected. All grass or stubble should be mowed and removed. If possible, it is best to use paper, such as sisal kraft as a floor. The grain should be piled in such a way as to shed the rain and it is preferable to use a tarp or other waterproof material as a covering. There are many ways of providing temporary storage with little loss of grain stored. The county agent suggests that you stop in at his office to discuss temporary storage if you have such a problem this year.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy Northness and daughter of Kalama, Wash., were week-end guests here at the home of her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. V. R. Runnion.

Washington Week

By CHARLES L. EGENROAD

Washington, D. C.—Gov. Thomas E. Dewey's nomination was less than 48 hours old when the fearful New Dealers began hiding behind the false protective job wall built up by the regime which contemplated the elimination of the two-party system in this country.

In a typical Dewey manner, the efficient New York governor stated in his acceptance speech that Washington could expect a house-cleaning.

At once, the New Dealers raised the clamor that most government workers are now under civil service and no change of administration could greatly reduce the number of persons on the public payroll.

So it comes to light from the lips of the planners. They cloaked their security in legislation and disregarded the welfare of the nation.

The New Deal horded a payroll of more than two millions of its believers and has attempted to say to 145,000,000 Americans: "This cannot be changed."

It was only natural that the New Dealers would interpret Gov. Dewey's house-cleaning intentions to mean that identities of those guzzling at the public trough for 16 years would be changed.

They never gave it a thought that he would mean that the tremendous duplication of effort, the silly and useless bureaus, the greatly over-manned agencies would experience policies of economy.

It never would occur to the New Dealers that an efficient administration could possibly get as much work and service out of the departments, bureaus and agencies with less personnel.

The frantic response of the New Dealers to Gov. Dewey's warning confirms a report made during the last session of the 80th Congress that administration leaders refused to meet expense cuts of the Congress by reducing the payroll—they just cut services instead.

That frantic response also confirms the judgment of most people that it is time for a change and time to save what is left of our Republic.

Among those spending the 4th at Bend were Mr. and Mrs. Edison Morgan and children, S. L. Wiles and Mr. and Mrs. Gordon White.
