munity and instead of pulling against each other they went to pulling together and within a few years their town became one of the most progressive places in the state.

The speaker used numerous other illustrations to bring out his point that people and communities have to get acquainted with each other. It starts within the small community and spreads to the state, the nation, and eventually makes its influence felt in world circles. He urged the various communities to avail themselves of the services of the chamber of commerce in working out their problems. He also urged that the people be alert to the threat of communism and other ideologies opposed to the democratic principles of government and living. He said the communists would rather destroy our way of life than to destroy us and likened public lethargy towards their insidious methods to the example given him once by a scientist friend who said that a frog can be boiled to death simply by placing it in a basin of cool water and slowly heating the water to the boiling point. The frog becomes inert and will not jump out of the basin when the water gets hot. He believes the same principle is being used on democratic principles and that the democracies should get out of the water before it becomes too late.
