Science's Fight on Cancer To Be Told in April Series of Articles

Ever see a 30-foot, 1,000 pound man? You probably won't—but by injecting pure growth hormone extracted from the pituitary gland they're growing healthy rats up to five times their normal size.

Ever think that an extra 40 pounds would give you a 25 per cent greater chance of having cancer than if you were underweight? It would, according to statistical studies of cancer.

Ever see a man walking with, by volume, most of his abdominal organs removed? They do—thanks to new surgical techniques.

Ever think there was a relationship between nerves and cancer? By cutting a sympathetic nerve, one scientist causes tremendous cancers to develop in one type of giant cockroach.

Ever think a virus could remain harmless for long periods of time—then become a rapacious killer because an infinitely small amount of calcium is added to the solution in which it exists? It does.

Ever think a mouse could be dying a massive, ugly cancer—and be apparently healthy and frisky, with the tumor gone, a couple of days later? That's happening . . . thanks to injections of spleen extract.

Ever think a human cancer patient, dying in great pain, could be sent back to a normal existence by injecting a poison gas? That happens occasionally—but the results, so far, are temporary.

Ever think that such innocent things as the sun's rays, x-rays, soot, oil, constant physical irritations and continual burning of certain tissues could cause cancer? Under some conditions they will.

Ever think that many of the things that cause cancer are used to treat cancer—radiations and certain chemicals, for example?

Ever know that by repeated brother-to-sister matings of cancerous mice, cancer-bearing strains can be developed?

Ever know that cancer-free mice can be nursed by mothers with breast cancer, and the young mice will develop cancer?

Ever know that cancer can be caused in the offspring by merely mating two particular kinds of fish?

These and other phenomena are being looked into by scientists supported by the American Cancer Society. A series of articles to appear during April will outline what research has found about cancer. Give for cancer research today!
