Charting Faults Protection Step With Earthquakes

Oregon State College — Earthquakes, like the weather, might seem to be something man talks about but can't do anything about. On the contrary, Dr. E. L. Packard, head of the geology department here, says something very important can be done about them here in the Pacific northwest.

Dr. Packard, as the only Oregon collaborator in seismology with the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey, is busy since the recent quake gathering all the facts possible from observers to help fill in the meager records of the few seismographs in the area. The only one between California and Washington is a homemade one here at O.S.C.

"More facts regarding earth faults, the source of earthquakes, are badly needed in connection with the future development of the Pacific northwest," Dr. Packard explains. "All the seismograph records in the world won't stop quakes from happening, but they can tell us in advance where they are most likely to happen. If we can get enough records over long enough period of time—including records of slight tremors not felt by man, we can chart the fault lines in the region. Then the most dangerous areas can be avoided in building dams or other major structures or in establishing waterworks. We now have little accurate information even about the major earth fault in the Puget Sound basin."

Dr. Packard said at least two seismographs are needed in Oregon, one east of the Cascades and one west. For the past two years he and members of the physics department here have been working with seismographs from the University of California and the U. S. Geodetic Survey to locate these to the best advantage.

The plan agreed upon is to place the present O. S. C. instrument at the Eastern Oregon College of Education at La Grande, then locate a Class A seismograph at a new site already tested on college land a few miles northwest of the campus where the formation is much more suitable than that of the present campus site. Carrying out of the plan has been held up awaiting funds for a small structure needed at the new site.

Tom Michos of Portland was a family motored to Walla Walla Tuesday to spend the day shopping and attending to business.
