REAPPORTIONMENT Continued from Page Three

Pressure Groups Can't Control Rural Oregon most often elects men to represent the entire citizenry of the county or district.

The pressure groups in rural Oregon are too small to control the election of a representative or senator. That is not always true of the city where many men are chosen because of their adherence to certain groups—and perhaps his promise to aid that group.

What U. S. Senate Did for West

The western part of the United States could never have been developed had it not been that each state has two senators to speak for it. The dams and ports and river improvements we have would never have been built were we not well represented in the senate. We would still be a province, feeding our money back to the east without opportunity to build for ourselves. There are as many representatives from the state of New York as we have in the eleven western states. We would have no chance if the United States followed the strictly proportional method advocated in the plan already filed in Oregon.

City Growth Depends on Rural

The same is true for Oregon which must have development in rural areas if it is to keep growing. The city can grow only as rural Oregon grows. This is not a rural-urban problem; this is a problem for all Oregon. More potatoes from Klamath and Deschutes, more wheat from Sherman and Umatilla, more lumber from Douglas and Coos, more seed crops from Yamhill and Union, more fish from Clatsop are the things that make Oregon great and make Portland grow. No one will build docks until there is something to ship; no one will start banks until there is money to protect; no one builds rail lines until there is something to haul; nor manufacturing plants until there is raw material to process. Development must come from rural areas where are found the natural resources on which we all live whether we are inhabitants of the city or the country.

Oregon with its 36 counties can easily make her change now. The senate chamber is large enough for six more seats. It does not have the vast number of counties found in many other states. Ours are comparatively large. The national average is 990 square miles and in Oregon the average is 2655 square miles.

Few people know how their own state is apportioned as to senators and representatives. Every one who has gone to school knows how this nation apportions its congress. We can well decide to follow the simpler and best known system.

Because this is the American method of apportionment, because it recognizes the fact that we need more than one method of choosing our legislative delegates, because it will help strengthen local government, because it will aid the development of the state, because it will help the city grow, because it is the fairest method devised for a democracy, the apportionment plan giving each county a senator should be approved and adopted.
