Rail Line Opened To Atomic Center Monday Morning

The fabulous Hanford Works, an area in central Washington half the size of Rhode Island in which the government produces atomic fuel, plutonium, today welcomed the arrival of the first Union Pacific freight train. At 8 a.m. Union Pacific's diesel-powered freight inaugurated daily service between Richland Junction and Richland over the new $2,000,000, 7 mile government rail extension. Richland Junction is a point on Union Pacific's Yakima branch, 5 miles west of Kennewick, Washington.
Union Pacific shares use of the new line with Northern Pacific and both lines have established local and transcontinental freight rates to and from Richland identical with rates applying to and from Kennewick.

The government's new rail extension was completed last week under the direction of General Electric, prime contractor to the Atomic Energy Commission. The job of railroad building was done by J. A. Terteling and Sons, contractors, of Boise, Idaho.
"The new line insures uninterrupted service" according to R. T. Cooke, superintendent of General Electric Company's transportation division which operates a network of government rail lines within Hanford Works.
Richland has a population of about 23,000 and North Richland, a construction town four miles distant, has 3,500. Both towns are within Hanford Works.

Here to attend graduation exercises for the 1950 class of Heppner high school were Mr. and Mrs. I. N. Vaughn and Mrs. M. E. Wise of Prosser, Washington. Mrs. Wise's granddaughter, Darlene Wise, was a member of the class.
