X-Ray Improvement Sought by Science

The use of x-rays for diagnosis and treatment of cancer has come a long way since the first phenomenal bone shadows were observed by Roentgen a half-century ago.

X-rays, radium and surgery are the recognized techniques for treating and curing cancer today, but they are effective only when tumors are localized. Once the tumors have spread to other parts of the body, cure is difficult if not impossible. While x-rays are extremely destructive to cancerous cells, they also injure normal tissues. An important problem of radiotherapists is to discover ways of concentrating lethal beams upon cancer with a minimum of damage to normal tissue through which they must pass. Scientists working under American Cancer Society grants are attempting to solve this problem in many ways. They are experimenting with super-voltage machines—up to more than five million, and in one institution they plan on using a synchrotron capable of producing 70 million volts. They are rotating the patient, pinpointing the beam on the tumor all the time, to lessen the effect on normal tissue. They are experimenting with chemicals which, when injected, may protect sensitive organs against radioactive damage.
