Oregon's Coastline Accessible Via Network of Good Highways

This is a continuation of the first of a series of 1951 motorlogs sponsored by The Oregonian and the Oregon State Motor Association. Like future motorlogs, this one, which appeared in The Sunday Oregonian Magazine section of May 20, was based on a winning letter in the newspaper's "My Motorlog" contest.

Staff Writer, The Oregonian

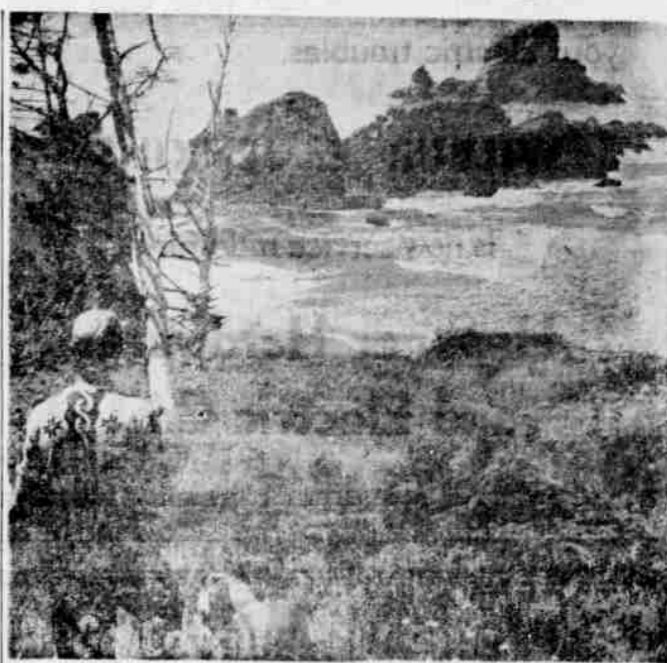

Too many people think of Oregon's scenic, recreation-filled coastline as the pot of gold at the end of the Sunset highway. While the Sunset highway was hands down as the easiest, speediest route to the Clatsop county beaches, there are nine other highways to the coast that are worth taking for their scenic value.

Nor do the northern beaches, most readily accessible by the superspeedy Sunset highway, have the only recreational pots of gold. Coos, Curry, Lincoln, Lane and Tillamook beaches may not be as populous as the Clatsop county stretches, but all are attractive—and growing in popularity.

For those who prefer rugged grandeur and the rifle-crack of giant breakers over a rock-bound coast, the more southern reaches of the coastline are breathtaking.

This Oregonian-Oregon State Motor association-sponsored motorlog was designed to take us over five of the state's ten highways leading to the coast. It was a leisurely three-day junket allowing for plenty of time at the beaches between valley-to-coast shuttles.

First leg of our motorlog took up to Astoria from Portland via the old Columbia River highway—curvy, scenic, worth traveling, but slow in spite of the light traffic. The Sunset highway bears the big load now.

Astoria, famous for its hills, canneries, fishing fleets and Finnish settlement, packs a tremendous scenic wallop to its waterfront. The whole pattern—broad sweep of the ship-dotted Columbia, Young's bay and the bar—is laid before your eyes like a watery crazy quilt if you climb the long flight of stairs in the Astor column and stand, panting and impressed, on the lofty balcony.

Next step was to traverse the fast Sunset highway, Portland-bound, until we could cut over to the Wilson River highway and return to the coast at Tillamook.

The cutoff we selected to the Wilson River highway was via Timber and Glenwood, a totally unfamiliar stretch of surprisingly good road, not wide, not particularly straight, but completely enjoyable because of the pleasant, rolling countryside and the absence of other cars.

From Glenwood to Tillamook, we were on the familiar—and fast—Wilson River highway. From Tillamook, we drove south on the Coast highway, stopping briefly at picturesque Neskevin.

We drove on the short section to Oceanlake, now indistinguishably merged with Delake under impetus of the North Lincoln beach area's rapid growth and found a place to spend the night.

Monday morning, we headed south for our first glimpse of the Sea Lion caves. As born-and-bred Oregonians, it's to our shame that we had never taken the time and trouble to see the caves—one of few such "natural wonder" attractions that proved even better than advertised.

The long zigzag path and winding stairs down into the caves produced just as dramatic a spectacle—at least 200 sea lions, both the sleek dark ones from California wintering in Oregon and the buff-colored Stellar sea lions native to Oregon.

From the caves we followed the coast highway along the rugged shoreline through Florence, stopping briefly to probe the waterfront at Waldport and on to Reedsport.

Leaving Reedsport we headed east along beautiful Winchester bay on the Umpqua highway, possibly the most scenic of Oregon's routes to the coast.

From Scottsburg the highway follows the clean, green, quick-flowing Umpqua river much of the way to Drain, where we hit the Pacific highway and from there to Eugene, the least pleasant leg of our junket.

The view on that stretch consisted mostly of rear-ends of cumbersome logging trucks.

It was sheer relief to veer off to the wider and straighter Pacific highway east at Junction City for the homeward leg of our journey—over the beautifully landscaped overpass at Albany, past the gleaming tower of the state house, through the rat race that is Salem's northbound traffic, thence to the four-lane peace and speed of the superhighway into Oregon City and Portland.
