Meat Balls Appear En Brochette

Devise clever servings to interest your family these warm days. For instance, you might bring to the table a surprise platter of minute meat balls en brochette. They're a tempting touch for indoors as well as out-of-doors eating.

Advises Reba Staggs, home economist, combine the meat mixture ahead of time (a favorite ground meat combination), then form it into small balls from 3/4 to 1 inch thick. Place the balls in your refrigerator and let them chill thoroughly. This way you'll find the balls much easier to handle.

When time comes to cook the brochette food, remove the balls from your refrigerator and thread on skewers (metal or wooden ones may be obtained from most meat dealers). In broiling, arrange the rack so that the balls are about 2 inches from the heat. When browned on the top side, turn and finish cooking on the second side. Total broiler time will be about 20 minutes.

Serve the balls en brochette on a large platter, perhaps in a circular spoke-form. Garnish with parsley, tomato wedges or other touches of color.

Equipment Exhibits Set For State Fair

Ample display of the latest types of farm machinery and equipment at the Oregon State Fair this year, was indicated today by Leo G. Spitzbart, general manager of the 86th annual exposition which begins on Saturday, September 1.

"We are confident," said Mr. Spitzbart, "that all the good farm friends of the Fair, visiting from all over the state, will find our farm equipment exhibits most interesting. And, rather extensive too, in spite of changes in promotional and merchandising policies by some major distributors and manufacturers."

Asked about these changes, Mr. Spitzbart went on to explain that certain manufacturers and distributors have told him that they favor exhibiting at county fair levels or in only the largest state expositions in areas where the rural population is exceptionally heavy.

To give our farm friends every advantage of keeping up with what's new in the way of equipment designed to make farming tasks easier, we have offered to let manufacturers and dealers pretty much set their own rates for exhibit space."

He added that, despite this offer, some still did not feel they could participate on a state-wide basis due to a desire to maintain peak sales-efficiency within their organization. The reason behind this feeling, Mr. Spitzbart pointed out, is that in setting up an exhibit for a State Fair, it usually entails the call-

Standardizing of Frozen Foods Sought by OSC

Food technologist at Oregon State college have completed the first phase of their part in a nation-wide study of commercially frozen peas and asparagus. The investigation is aimed at giving the consumer a better idea of what he is getting when he buys a package of these vegetables.

The project is a cooperative study with the National Association of Frozen Food Packers in Washington, D. C., and the National Frozen Food Association.

Special samples of peas and asparagus packed in the Pacific Northwest and California under varying processing conditions and stages of maturity have been analyzed by members of the food technology department of the OSC agricultural experiment station. The samples were tested after one, three, six and twelve months storage at zero degrees. They were analyzed to determine enzyme content, acetaldehyde, fiber and other physical and chemical properties.

In addition to the special samples, about 250 regular commercial packages of frozen peas and asparagus have been graded at OSC.

Final objective of the investigation, which has been under way for about three years, is to assist the Food and Drug administration in developing definite standards of identity, quality and fill of containers of these products, according to E. H. Wiegand, head of the OSC food technology department. Such standards are important to both consumers and packers of frozen vegetables, he declared.

Results of the OSC analyses already completed have been sent to Washington, D. C. for correlation with similar data collected in other sections of the country. Work on the study will be continued at OSC for another year.
