Feeding Minerals to Livestock Explained

Intelligent use of mineral supplements in livestock feeding will pay dividends, but over-use may prove harmful.

That's a bit of advice for Oregon farmers contained in "Minerals for Livestock," bulletin number 503, just released by the Oregon State college agricultural experiment station.

Up-to-date recommendations for feeding various minerals to livestock are contained in the new bulletin, written by Dr. J. R. Haag, OSC animal nutrition chemist.

Mineral deficiencies are responsible for livestock losses in some areas, but indiscriminate feeding of these supplements is not a blanket remedy for unthrifty livestock, diseases or other disturbances, Dr. Haag points out.

Copies of the publication are available at OSC or county extension offices.
