

Classification Of State's Land Resources Asked

An immediate classification of Oregon's land resources has been requested by a statewide land economics committee headed by Charles A. Tom, Rufus.

It was one of the committee's recommendations which was acted on favorably at the recent statewide agricultural conference at Oregon State College. Through extensive field work, the committee said boundaries of areas primarily suited to forestry, grazing, cultivated crops, recreation, watershed protection, wild life or combinations of these used could be determined.

Maps and other material prepared should then become the guide for county, state, and federal programs on these areas, Tom explained.

The committee also recommended that federal mining laws be amended to accomplish the following: Make mineral prospecting and location of mining claims subject to appropriate restrictions in order that abuse be prevented; and allow owners of mining claims to have mineral rights only, reversing to the government all other resources except those required for mining.

Other recommendations included one to have all federally owned revenue-producing property pay to local taxing units an amount equal to the tax assessment if the property were in private ownership. The committee cited the fact that about 58 percent of Oregon's land area is owned by various municipal, county, state and federal agencies. Much of the land is revenue producing, yet the revenue returned varies from nothing for certain lands as much as 75 percent of the receipts from others.

Tom said the principle of assessed value and payments on the basis of local tax levies has been recognized by congress in the case of the Coos Bay reversion road grants. These lands are appraised every ten years and pay the equivalent of annual tax levies from receipts.

raised and fed at home, the specialist says Carleton is recommended for the Columbia basin. Shasta, Overland and Victoria are his choices for central Oregon. In the Snake river area of eastern Oregon, Overland and Cody are best suited.

Idahybrid 680 and U. S. 13 are suggested corn varieties for the Columbia basin, while Idahybrid 544, Western 90 Day, or Idahybrid 680 are recommended for the area along the Idaho line.

In Hermiston, Umatilla and Malheur areas, corn will yield better than 125 bushels per acre and will compete favorably with yields received in the "corn belt", Warren adds.

Applications of nitrogen fertilizers will increase yields of all cereals, and for wheat, oats and barley, 30 to 40 pounds of available nitrogen applied before planting is suggested in irrigated and high rainfall areas. For corn, nitrogen and phosphorus combinations such as 16-20 give best results. Two hundred pounds per acre, applied at planting, broadcast before, or side-dressed after planting, will increase yields.

(Each week the Gazette Times will run a suggestion by the Morrow county Fair Board on possible exhibits for this fall's fair. It's just a reminder of ways you can help make a bigger and better fair.)

Hope all of you have been busy this winter on fancy work. It is one of the exhibits that seems to draw its share and more of attention from the public. Originals in crochet design, you know, have a special prize.

Spring Crop Emphasis On Feed Grains

Here's the answer to that question: "Which feed grain variety shall I plant?"

Depending somewhat on where you live, Rex Warren, Oregon State college extension farm crop specialist, says Hannehan barley is the most popular spring grain variety. In addition to being a good, high producing feed grain, it has the added advantage of being acceptable as brewing barley.

Hannehan is the recommended barley variety in central Oregon and the Klamath basin. Warren gives the nod to Meloy or Flynn 37 as Columbia basin choices, and in the Snake river-Malheur county area, Bonneville is his pick. None of these three as a brewing type.

Emphasis this spring is on feed grains, Warren says, adding that he believes they are about as profitable a crop as can be planted now. He bases his judgment on the fact that livestock numbers are on the increase and grain feed supplies will likely have difficulty keeping pace with demand.

Federation is the most popular spring wheat variety for eastern Oregon. While most oats are
