OSC Research Gives Insight Into Beef Cattle Gain Factors An insight into some of the factors affecting rate and economy of gain in beef cattle including birth weight, sex of animal and type have come from the beef cattle improvement project being carried on by the Oregon State college agricultural experiment station. The Oregon work, which is part of a vast western regional project, has shown during the past six years that for the best results in beef cattle operations rate and efficiency of gain must be considered in animal selection along with type and conformation.

Latest findings from the project are outlined in a new station technical bulletin prepared by Jerome J. Dahmen, research assistant, and Dr. Ralph Bogart, animal husbandman.

In the new publication, the authors point out that birth weight has a significant effect on both rate and economy of gain. Calves larger at birth will tend to reach slaughter weight at a younger age and with less feed.

The current trend to market cattle at younger ages increases the importance of the birth weight consideration in animal selection, researchers emphasize.

Bulls have been shown to gain faster and to utilize feed more efficiently than heifers. The average daily gain for bulls during a recent test period was 2.3 pounds as compared to an average daily gain of 2.0 pounds for heifers. Bulls required an average of 391 pounds total digestible nutrients to gain 100 pounds body weight during the test while the heifers required an average of 483 pounds TDN.

No relationship was found between suckling and feed lot gains. Dahmen and Bogart point out, however, that suckling gains are important as a measurement of the milking ability of the dam.

Weaning conformation scores did not have a significant effect on either rate of economy of gains during the test. The animal husbandmen found furthermore that the appearance of the calves was not a reliable index of either efficiency or capacity for growth. This indicates, they explain, that it is possible to combine good appearance in the same animal.

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar George and Mr. and Mrs. LaVerne Van Marter, Jr., returned Thursday from Lake Tahoe and Reno, Nevada, where they spent a ten day vacation.

Dr. and Mrs. Archie D. McMurdo had as their guests during the weekend, Mrs. Pearl Sweek, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Moore of Pendleton and Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Hulden of Arlington.
