

Grain Movement By Barge and Truck Reaches New Peak

August marked a record-breaking movement of grain via river barges and trucks into Portland, according to word from the state department of agriculture.

It almost appeared, recounts C. W. Wright, chief of the department's division of grain inspection, as though Portland elevators, mills and docks were in the midst of the grain fields as streams of trucks lined up throughout the day awaiting turns at unloading and as river barges almost constantly discharged their yellow gold at specially equipped elevators or waited their turns at the unloading berths.

By these two modes of hauling (and does not touch at all upon the rail movement), 1,902,622 bushels of grain were shipped in to Portland last month. Forty-three barges discharged 811,578 bushels of wheat and 1,180 trucks hauled in 578,759 bushels of wheat. Slightly more than 150 truckloads of oats and barley were inspected. Truck movement of barley was under last year; because of better quality for malting purposes, more barley was loaded by rail for direct shipment.

Shipping grains by barges is of fairly recent origin on the Columbia river. At the outset, small wooden barges were used but in recent years specially designed steel barges have been installed. These have capacity ranging from 17,000 to 26,500 bushels or equivalent to from 8 to 13 average cars of grain. The barge shipments originate at the ports of The Dalles, Arlington, and Umatilla in Oregon and Port Kelly, Washington.

Truck movement by ranchers is nothing new, but in the last two years commercial truck lines have entered the field in a big way. Now large trucks and trailers, with a capacity as great as 680 bushels for the combined rig, make regular "grain" runs into Portland from central and eastern Oregon and from as far east as Twin Falls, Idaho. The commercial truck with trailer has an overall measurement of 50 feet from bumper to bumper, and will haul between nine and ten times as much grain as the average privately owned truck.
