Forestry Lab Finds Promising New Use For Lodgepole Pine

Using lodgepole pine for manufacture of hardboards and veneers has tremendous possibilities, according to Karl Bollerslev, wood technologist at the Oregon Forest Product laboratory.

Preliminary studies at the laboratory have produced a lodgepole pine hardboard that is at least equal in strength to Douglas fir boards. Lodgepole pine boards are noticeably light colored. Including bark in the fiber hardly changes the hardboard color, Bollerslev said.

This would be third major use of lodgepole pine. Since it is a small tree its uses are somewhat limited. Lodgepole pine is now mainly used for lumber and pulpwood, Bollerslev continued.

In Oregon, there are more than 1,250,000 acres of lodgepole pine, containing 800,000,000 board feet of lumber. This is a large enough amount to insure an adequate supply for lodgepole-using industries.

Laboratory research on making lodgepole pine hardboards has been by the dry process method. The waterless method would be more desirable in Eastern and Central Oregon regions where the water supply is limited, Bollerslev added.

Milk Control

We don't claim that the present law is without faults and that it should be amended by the legislature. Under the present law the family with children is assured of being able to buy milk—and at a reasonable price. The dairymen have cut down on the butterfat content—and sold the cream separately in order to keep milk prices down.

The dairyman's costs have gone up. Milk sold for 16c per quart when hay sold for $14.00 per ton. Milk now sells for 25c per quart when hay sells for $35.00 to $40.00.

The state sanitary code under the department of Agriculture, not the Milk Control Board, are much more rigid. We estimate that it would cost a minimum of $65,000 to $100,000 to set up a dairy that would be able to supply the Heppner area with Grade A milk.

Milk is practically a public utility as it is an essential of everyone's health. Power companies are regulated by the state, water supplies are regulated by state. Why allow milk to be used as a political issue?
