Power Restrictions Eased by Rainfall

Restrictions on the use of electricity, brought on by last fall's regional water power shortage, have been lifted by the Defense Electric Power Administration, according to word received here by J. R. Huffman, local manager for Pacific Power and Light company.

The DEPA action means that large industries which have been required to cut back their power use by 10 per cent since mid-November may now return to regular operation. In addition, other customers who voluntarily joined in the drive to conserve power may now resume their normal use.

"We appreciate greatly the fine cooperation given by customers in the program for voluntary curtailment, which made it possible to avoid a more serious cut in industrial use of power. We also appreciate the fine efforts of the large industries which were directly affected by the mandatory curtailment order," said Huffman.

"It will still be necessary to produce much steam-generated electricity in order to permit the restrictions on power use to be lifted, and the present temporary surcharges on electric service bills necessarily will be continued until the already accumulated extra costs have been abolished."
