Grass-Fed Cattle Start to Market In Record Numbers

Grass-fed cattle which make up 80 percent of Oregon's one million beef population are starting to markets in what may reach record numbers during the August to October peak, reports an Oregon State college extension livestock marketing specialist.

Edward Coles says the large supply of grass cattle will grade "commercial" and "good" and is expected to retail at lower prices than present supplies which have come largely from grain-fed cattle producing "high good" to "prime" cuts of beef.

The OSC specialist assures the housewives that grass-fed beef is just as tasty, nutritious and wholesome as grain-fed cattle. The number of grass cattle that will be channeled to meat counter centers around the livestock feed problem and the controversial subject of surplus wheat supplies. Lowered feed costs could attract many of Oregon's grass cattle to local and California feed lots for further finishing.

Coles points out that weekly slaughter of beef cattle on the national scale is running 40 percent or more above a year ago. More than 26 million head were slaughtered last year, but the growing supply shows no signs of slackening. Some 35 to 36 million calves are now born each year.

A January census of beef cattle placed the national figure at 56 million for an increase of six million head over last year. For the first time in history, beef cattle in the United States outnumbered hogs which slipped from 64 to 54 million during the past

Geologists Slate Central Oregon Study

OREGON STATE COLLEGE—Student geologists from Oregon State college will take to the field for the 20th year this summer as part of an advanced course that has produced complete geologic information on nearly 3000 square miles of central Oregon.

The first half of the 6-week field course will be spent near Mitchell and the second around Dayville. Students organize and run the tent field camp—including cooking the meals—along with their rock studies.

In addition to the practical training it affords students, the course serves the state in valuable fashion by supplying maps and data on little-known geologic areas.

The geologic map for the Round Mountain quadrangle—some 900 square miles—has been published from this work and the Dayville, Mitchell and part of the Spray quadrangle maps are nearing completion.

Dr. W. D. Wilkinson, professor of geology, established the course in 1933, and has directed the training every year. Central Oregon is an especially good area for the work since readily-accessible rock formations there go back some 200 million years.
