Wustenberg's survey was over a two-year period on Lookout creek. It is a headwater tributary to the McKenzie river...

Contrary to popular opinion, it is not the actual logging which provides the major source of sediment entering a stream...

Wustenberg feels that methods of eliminating a large amount of the sediment going into Lookout creek could be devised without undue cost...

Also to be determined is the biological role of small tributaries in relation to Lookout creek. Protection of the tributaries from logging disturbances similar to that exercised on the main stream would be almost impossible unless deemed essential to the welfare of the main body of water.
