IMPROPER HANDLING OF MARKET LIVESTOCK CUTS FARM PROFITS Improper handling of livestock during loading and transporting to market causes losses running into thousands of dollars annually in Oregon alone, according to Harry Lindgren, Oregon State college extension animal husbandry specialist. Reports from slaughter houses indicate that trimmings made necessary by bruises represent a national loss of several million dollars each year. Millions more are lost through weight shrinkage and illness that result from undue exposure or lack of feed, water and rest. Since these losses are reflected in lower market prices for animals, Oregon producers have a stake in reducing such losses to a minimum, declares the OSC specialist. Lindgren says transit injuries can be lowered if animals are not hurried during driving and loading, particularly when they are passing through gates or narrow passages. Squeezing against posts and walls causes severe and deep bruising. A canvas slapper or electric prod should be used to encourage stubborn animals. Sharp sticks, whips, and clubs cause injuries that reduce the value of the carcass. Another precaution the shipper should take, if possible, is to select a carrier that has adequate facilities and a reputation for handling livestock with a minimum of rough treatment and losses. Vehicles used for transportation should be reasonably clean and dry, with inside walls free from rough projections that might cause injury. Animals should be provided with good feed and clean water and an opportunity to rest at regular intervals in transit, the specialist says.
