"This may startle you, Joe. Maybe I shouldn't be so frank. But you'd be better off to have NO INSURANCE than to have the small amount you carry now."

I had led with my chin and Joe took a verbal swing at it.

"What do you mean?" he said. "The insurance I've got is certainly better than none. It suits me. What's wrong with it?"

"Just this, Joe. It's inadequate. Not broad enough and not large enough. And because you've got some insurance, you think you're properly protected."

I paused. "Joe, you've been lulled into a FALSE feeling of security. That's why you'd be better off with none. At least, then, you'd be aware of your danger."

"I get the point," Joe said. "What is involved in bringing my insurance up to par?"

I outlined the coverages needed. "It looks like that will do the job," Joe said. "I was satisfied because I never had considered those hazards. I agree that the insurance suggested is the kind I need for real security."
