Across The Counter

Mike had a sinking feeling when informed of his loss. He knew the damage would exceed the limits of his fire insurance policy. All of a sudden, he acquired a new perspective—and added respect—for insurance.

Sure enough, the bad fire loss totaled $65,000 in damages; his policy was for $40,000. A net loss to Mike of $25,000.

Naturally, he was more than glad that he had $40,000 worth of insurance. It was a real comfort. It eased the sting of the blow he still faced—the damages he would have to pay for himself.

At first Mike rationalized. "After all," he thought, "that's as good as can be expected on a large loss." Deep down Mike knew this wasn't true. It wouldn't have cost much to have had ADEQUATE LIMITS. But he had avoided the bother of calling since he didn't expect such a staggering loss to happen to him.

Mike's wiser now. The next loss—if any—will not catch him with unrealistic limits.
