Legume, Grass Test Findings Outlined By OSC Agronomist

High yields among 42 grasses and legumes under experiment last year in an irrigated pasture project at Oregon State college were alta fescue, several species of Orchard, and Tualatin of the grasses and alfalfa, several species of birdfoot trefoil, ladino clover, and big trefoil of the legumes.

Very low yields were Merion bluegrass and the European and California burnet with the other grasses and legumes ranging in between.

H. A. Schoth, OSC agronomist, who reported these research results at the recent OSC grassland field day, says that although the one year's results are not enough for definite pasture recommendations, they can bear directly on production and management of irrigated pastures, after further tests are made.

The project, part of research to find out how to obtain maximum profit from irrigated pastures, includes small-plot studies and animal grazing experiments.

First year's results were obtained from Small-plot experiments, the purpose of which was to screen out large numbers of treatments before the more expensive animal grazing trials. Schoth said the experimental data obtained from animal grazing trials can be applied immediately by the farmer or livestock feeder to his own operations.

Grasses used in the project were seeded in May, 1952. Yields are for the 1953 season. All species were clipped seven times

Range Improvements To Be Demonstrated At Burns Field Day

Doubled hay yields from flood meadows and tripled grass production from sagebrush range in southeast Oregon have reached the "see for yourself" stage. These are scheduled highlights of the annual field day, July 1 and 2, at Squaw Butte-Harney range and livestock experiment station near Burns.

A tour of experimental meadows seven miles south of Burns on Highway 205 will open the program July 1 at 1 p. m. according to W. A. Sawyer, station superintendent. Featured this year will be "Fields of Clover."

Visitors will see large areas in the process of conversion by fertility and management practices from typical rusesedge meadows with a n average 25-day regrowth period. A total of 185 pounds of nitrogen fertilizer was applied in four applications in 1953.

Legumes were seeded in May, 1952 also. White and ladino clovers were clipped six times; bird-foot trefoils, alfalfas and burnets four times; and big trefoil three times during the season. All plots received 3 tons of lime and 60 pounds of phosphate at seeding time. An application of 200 pounds gypsum was made in the spring of 1953.

The project, Schoth explained, has demonstrated the value of knowing the various forage plants. Different grass and legume species vary widely in yielding ability in pure stands under irrigation, he concluded.

discussion of the meadow improvement program including use of nitrogen fertilizer that has stepped up the hay yields as high as an estimated four tons per acre. Rate and time of application and the form of nitrogen used will be discussed. Bill Southworth, Seneca rancher, will review the meadow improvement program as seen from the operator's standpoint.

Sagebrush-range improvement will be featured the second day with a tour of the Squaw Butte station 42 miles West of Burns on Highway 20 starting at 8 a. m. Points of interest include chemical spraying to control big sagebrush, trial methods for range re-seeding, and use of nitrogen fertilizer that has nearly doubled crested wheatgrass yields.

Increased herbage production from about two tons to over six tons on 40 acres of range in one year after sagebrush spraying is reported by Donald Hyder, station range conservationist. He will conduct a question and answer session. Roy Forman, Antelope rancher, will also discuss the range improvement program.
