Sherman Experiment Farm Plans July 7 Fertilizer Trials

Nitrogen fertilizer trials to maintain wheat yields while reducing soil erosion with trashy fallow will highlight the Sherman branch experiment station's annual field day, July 7.

William E. Hall, acting superintendent, says the program will start at 1:30 p. m. at the experiment station farm one-half mile east of Moro. The area is typical of much of the Columbia Basin low-rainfall wheat lands.

Fifty-four test plots will compare use of fertilizers and various ways of preparing land for fallow. Fertilizer experiments on winter wheat after fallow and on annual cropped spring wheat are testing both ammonia nitrate (dry form) and anhydrous ammonia (gas form). Gratuated applications run as high as 75 pounds of actual nitrogen per acre.

Visitors will see results of 14-year trials to reduce wind and water erosion by leaving a major part of the crop residues on or near the soil surface. Fallow land has been prepared by offset disking to mix soil and stubble, sweep plowing that leaves all stubble. Average yields for the 14-year period are recorded to test levels of nitrogen required to maintain production under the various tillage methods.

Winter wheat seeding rates which vary widely among farmers of the area have been tested for two years with rates ranging from 30 pounds of seed per acre up to 90 pounds. The same experiment compares dates of seeding starting September 1 with two-weeks intervals until November 1.

New varieties of wheat, oats and barley are on trial at the cereal nursery along with comparative yield experiments on established varieties for the area. First year fertilizer trials with Safflower, a new crop in the Pacific Northwest, and the place of alfalfa in the soil fertility program for the region are among other field tour highlights.

Hall says women are invited to join the tour or to visit at the experiment station house.
