On arrival in the morning the grade school children will report to their various rooms and the high school students will report

Barley Prices Stay Higher Than Expected

Barley prices, although not as high as last year at this time, are better than was expected earlier, report agricultural economists at Oregon State College.

Reasons for this current strength in the market have become apparent during the last few days, the economists explain.

Growers are now better prepared to take advantage of the government loans on barley. Much storage space has been added on farms and some new space is available at shipping points.

Quality of malting varieties has been lowered by unfavorable weather in such important producing areas as the Klamath Basin, central California and parts of the midwest. The Western Oregon crop will be good unless rain comes during harvest.

Canada is expected to offer less barley for export this year, the economists say. Reports are that floods and wet weather have cut Canada's production prospects at least 10 percent from last year.

Important also is the fact that corn has made a very poor showing in the midwest and corn prices are now higher than a year ago. Barley prices generally tag along pretty close on the heels of corn, the economists point out. This is true for malting as well as feed barley, although malting premiums vary from year to year.

The economists warn that despite these new evidences of strength, this year's ~~near-record~~ barley crop seems large enough to keep prices under last fall's market. Odds seem against much further strength in barley before January. Prices may go lower if the corn crop improves.

Prices for No. 1 malting barley seem likely to settle near $45 to $50 for Oregon growers. This is $5 to $10 under last year. The economists earlier expected prices to be $10 to $15 lower.
