No Changes Found In Crop Quality From Fertilizers

Fertilizer applications that gave marked yield increases of forage and grain crops did not change the nutritive value of the crops in a recent midwest experiment studied by two Oregon state college scientists.
T. L. Jackson, OSC soils specialist, and J. E. Oldfield, animal nutritionist, report that food value of the crops was changed little, if any, by the level of soil fertility during a 10-year experiment by Michigan State college.
The study also showed that quality and quantity of milk from cows did not vary whether they received grain and forage from soils that were high in fertility or comparatively low. If a cow's ration is deficient in protein or minerals, her milk production will decrease, but the composition of the milk stays the same, according to the study.
One side of the badly-depleted test farm received a complete fertilizer treatment of nitrogen, phosphate, potash and lime. The other side had only comparable nitrogen treatment.

Test crops for the fertilizer programs were timothy and smooth brome grass for hay and corn and soybeans for grain. These supplied the exclusive ration of two dairy herds isolated on the farm for the 10-year period. In the comparisons, there were no significant differences in the protein or mineral content of feed produced with the two fertilizer programs.

Jackson pointed out that while forage harvest could have been boosted considerably with adapted legumes on the high-fertility side of the farm, types of crops were limited for test purposes.
Oldfield reported no important differences in chemical composition or nutritive value of milk from the two herds whether they received feed from soil of high or low fertility.
