New Events Added For 4-H Members At State Fair

New 4-H club events scheduled for State Fair this year promise to add even more color and education to the week-packed program for boys and girls chosen to represent all counties and the cities of Portland and Salem, reports Cal G. Monroe, state 4-H agent at Oregon State college.

A tractor operators' contest, open to one club member from each county, will test both driving and mechanical skills. It includes a series of obstacle courses in hitching to farm implements, backing, turning, and general handling of the tractor and equipment with skill, speed and safety. Contestants will also inspect an old tractor for mechanical and safety defects and will take a written examination on tractor operation.

Also added to this year's competition is an exhibit in conservation of Oregon's natural resources. Exhibits will feature conservation of soil, water, forests, range and wildlife. They will be judged on workmanship, attractiveness, and educational value and teaching of approved conservation practices.

Another special event is an educational livestock marketing program at the Portland union stockyards, September 7. Club exhibitors who sell market stock through the yards will see their animals sold, learn how the stockyards operate, and will tour a packing plant and retail meat market. Club members have the option to sell animals privately or to take them home.

Also for the first time, 4-Hers enrolled in any project can participate in individual as well as a team demonstration. During the public demonstrations, contestants explain how to make or do something related to their project such as baking, sewing, electricity or safety.

Monroe says growing interest in the 4-H flower arrangement contest now makes it possible to divide the tent into two classes for club members over and under 14 years of age.

New Weed Chemicals Promising in Tests

Weeds! Those pesky plants that cut down crop yields in Oregon fields and gardens and cause production costs to rise, had better start worrying. At least those in corn, bean, onion and legume fields.

Scientists at Oregon State college have been testing two types of selective weed killers that look quite promising for control of such annual grass and broadleaf weeds as pigweed, annual bluegrass and purslane.

William R. Furtick, in charge of the experimental work, says that when applied properly the chemicals shouldn't harm the crop. Used as a spray, the chemicals are applied directly to soils after planting and prior to the time the weeds come up. Rates vary from 3 to 12 pounds per acre.

The weed killers belong to two different groups of chemicals, chloro-acetamides and thio-carbamates. Their commercial value will depend upon their cost per acre, and whether or not they are effective under a wide range of conditions.

Furtick emphasizes that further tests are necessary before the chemicals can be released for general use.
