CAPITAL PARADE

Continued from Page 2 "equal pay for equal work" law despite the fact that the new law failed to direct him to do so in specific terms.

Thornton said that in his opinion, it is clear that the enforcement and protection of the rights recognized in the law are encompassed within the general duties of the labor commissioner to the extent that the law confers rights upon wage earners generally and women workers specifically.

Some Cattle Prices Climb Slightly

HERMISTON — Tucker Echo Ranches was the big consignor at the Hermiston livestock auction Friday, sale manager Delbert Anson said.

The ranches sold 255 cattle and received top money for one whiteface bull of 1455 pounds. They were paid $15.50 per hundred-weight for the single animal.

Anson said the market was fully steady, with bulls, grass slaughter steers and 850-pound grass heifers higher. Commercial cows were stronger on younger animals and fat dairy and cutter cows showed some strength.

Next Friday, the market will require more feeder steers and grass fat cows and heifers. Anson said that the demand for bulls seems to be growing stronger.

At last week's auction, feeder and packer buyers from Oregon, Idaho, Washington and California were on hand.

Those receiving top prices at the market were: H. W. Lambert, Hermiston, $21.00 for one baby calf; C. C. Hughes, Hermiston, $19.00 per hundred-weight for two fat hogs of 455 pounds; Kinard McDaniel, Hardman, $8.00 per hundred-weight for 12 ewes at 1455 pounds; J. L. Raley, Milton-Freewater, $11.25 per hundred-weight for four yearling ewes at 490 pounds; Sam Grant, Prescott, Wash., $17.50 per hundred-weight for 23 lambs at 2695 pounds; Glen McCracken, Stanfield, $20.25 per hundred-weight for one Hereford veal at 320 pounds; A. F. Gouge, Hermiston, $18.80 per hundred-weight for one 880-pound white face heifer; Gilmer Belson, Boardman, $17.10 per hundred-weight for 13 white face heifers at 8020 pounds; Fred Rankin, Hermiston, $18.70 per hundred-weight for 29 Hereford feeder steers at 22,760 pounds; Kenneth Robertson, Hermiston, $15 for one Guernsey cow.

Wheat Controls World Wide Say OSC Economists

Farmers growing wheat in Oregon and the rest of the United States are not alone with their problems of price supports or controls.

Agricultural extension service economists at Oregon State college say 96 percent of the world's wheat crop is produced and marketed under some form of price controls.

The 1954-55 world crop totaled 6.8 billion bushels of it grown in countries that exercise some control over prices and production. That holds true for nearly all of the wheat moving into channels of international trade.

In general, anywhere in the world, countries set up price support policies and programs to keep producer prices at higher levels than they would have been without the controls, say the economists.

Importing countries do this to stimulate production in order to cut down on imports. Measures used to regulate imports and subsidize consumers include tariffs, import quotas, compulsory

State Wheat Growers In Good Position To Avoid Discounts

Oregon wheat growers are in good position to avoid possible "black list" varieties under the government's new program to upgrade wheat quality for support price eligibility, reports D. D. Hill, Oregon State college farm crops department head.

Recent announcement that the U. S. department of agriculture will discount 24 "undesirable" wheat varieties under its 1956 price support program is "a signal for growers to take full advantage of available wheat breeding and testing findings," Hill stated.

The only major Pacific Northwest variety named for discount is Rex, a common soft white winter wheat having inferior milling and baking qualities. Rex will be penalized 20 cents a bushel by the federal ruling. Ray Teal, OSC seed and grain marketing specialist says this means the 1956 support price at local Rex-producing areas would be about $1.50 a bushel after adjustments from the Portland support price, storage costs and the new discount.

Rex has been most popular in northern Morrow and Gilliam counties. Its resistance to the drouth, shattering and smut has helped maintain its popularity with Oregon farmers who produced 2 1/2 million bushels in 1954.

Hill said the crackdown on Rex focuses attention on the need for growers to look beyond production performance and to increase only those varieties that meet trade standards.

The OSC agronomist expressed special concern over certain new "unnamed" varieties, developed by the college experiment stations, that have escaped into growers' hands in recent years. Some of the varieties are high-yielding but failed to meet quality standards established by the industry and were not officially released for commercial plantings.

Seed of some of these varieties is available, but Hill said increased production would undoubtedly place such varieties on the "undesirable" list.

Safeguards for maintaining Pacific Northwest wheat quality have been strengthened, Hill explained, by establishment of the Wheat Quality laboratory at Pullman, Wash., where regional plant breeders can have wheat selections tested for milling and baking qualities.

Through efforts of the Oregon Wheat Growers league and the Oregon Wheat commission, the USDA western regional laboratory at Albany, Cal., has also engaged in basic research on many aspects of wheat quality.

No variety is released by experiment stations of Oregon, Idaho, and Washington unless it meets quality standards.

Regional wheat prospects are also strengthened by the announcement that several new wheat varieties may be available to growers by 1956. They include both soft wheat varieties for specialty flours and high yielding hard wheats for bread flour.

The continued emphasis on quality should result eventually in better utilization of wheat from the Pacific Northwest. More local wheat may be milled and wheat from the area may be better able to meet the competition in the foreign market, he concluded.

use of home-grown grain subsidies to local flour millers, and control over bread prices.

In the wheat exporting countries, the primary objective is to expedite the sale of surpluses abroad and at the same time assure growers their returns from such sales won't fall below the minimum guaranteed for the entire crop. This involves some form of export subsidy.

Policies for supporting and influencing wheat prices have become firmly established in almost all of the wheat producing countries of the world, the OSC economists continue. However, the actual programs vary considerably from country to country and are changing constantly.

These programs can be grouped loosely in this order: fixed prices, government purchase, guaranteed minimum prices, directional prices, deficiency payments, guaranteed price ranges, indirect price supports, pre-contracting prices, and communist state planning.

OSC Appoints Plant Disease Specialist

Oregon State college has announced appointment of Iain MacSwan as extension plant pathology specialist to assist state commodity groups, county extension agents, and individuals in combating plant diseases. He fills a recent vacancy in the department.

MacSwan will be in charge of the OSC plant clinic founded 15 months ago to provide free diagnosis of sick plants for Oregon farmers and gardeners. The new specialist will also coordinate the educational program between local county extension agents and OSC plant pathology researchers and will work closely with Oregon commodity groups in conducting their industry improvement programs.

MacSwan graduated from the University of British Columbia in 1942 and later did graduate study in plant pathology and plant nutrition there. Since 1948, he has been assistant provincial plant pathologist in the British Columbia department of agriculture with headquarters at Vancouver. The appointment is subject to approval by the Oregon state board of higher education.
