Century-Old Yakima Valley Post Restored, Motorloggers Discover

The following is a condensation of a motorlog appearing in the July 10 issue of Northwest Oregonian. It is one of an annual series sponsored jointly by the Oregon State Motor association and The Oregonian.

BY MERVIN SHOEMAKER
 Staff Writer, The Oregonian

The white man and the Yakima Indian did their last important fighting about 100 years ago. Today they are co-operating in one of the Pacific Northwest's most intriguing historical projects.

This is the restoration of old Fort Simcoe, reached by a road that comes to a dead end in the pine foothills of the Cascade mountains 28 miles west and south of Toppenish, Wash.

This is a good motorlog target for a one-day or two-day trip, and the scenery hereabouts is worth taking a rather long way around to get there.

We took our white Oregon State Motor association Ford east on highway 30 from Portland and across the Columbia river at the Paterson ferry—50 cents—about ten miles upstream from where we had turned onto highway 730 near Boardman.

It's a fast 27 miles to Prosser, Wash. From Prosser to Toppenish you can make better time by taking highway 3A, which is a fine road, rather than highway 3, which the map indicates is the main road. The latter has more larger towns with reduced speed zones.

The 27 miles from Toppenish to Fort Simcoe is mostly well paved, but there is a five or six-mile stretch of gravel road before the visitor passes through the heavy timber entrance to the site of the old fort.

Restoration Shared

The restoration is principally the work of the Washington state parks and recreation commission, together with the national parks service, and with the support of the Fort Simcoe at Mool-Mool Restoration society at Yakima, Wash.

The Indians are very much in the picture, because the site is on the Yakima Indian reservation. It is under a lease agreement with the Yakima Indian nation that the fort is being restored as a monument to the Indian wars.

Progress so far on the project includes restoration of the commandant's house and one officer's home as well as razing several later structures to allow more room for picnicking.

Commandant's house, finest of structures at old Fort Simcoe, is being restored to original condition under project of Washington state parks and recreation commission, along with the national parks service and Yakima Indians at reservation.

Map indicates route of motorlog up highway 30, by Columbia, then across Paterson ferry and through Horse Heaven hills, with the highway steeply descending into the Yakima valley.

The program will also involve furnishing the residences as they once were.

Fort Simcoe had been established after the Yakima Indian war of 1855-56 at the suggestion of Maj. Gen. John Ellis Wool, commander of the department of the Pacific, according to Albert Culverwell, historian for the Washington state parks and recreation commission, writing in the Pacific Northwest Quarterly.

The name "Simcoe" comes from the Indian "sim-ku-ee," meaning "saddle in a hill," derived from a noticeable saddle-like dip in a ridge north of the fort.

Only small groups of Indians engaged the soldiers stationed at Fort Simcoe in the brief time between its construction and abandonment by the army.

Fort Simcoe served a purpose in being there during the tag end of Indian fighting in central and south central Washington. It was a base for operations elsewhere for one thing, and it also had the salutary warning effect of a policeman in sight.

Soon abandoned for its original purpose, it owes its partial survival to its aptness for conversion to another use. In 1859 the army moved out, the buildings were turned over to the department of Indian affairs, and an Indian agency that had been established near the mouth of the White Salmon river was moved to the fort.

The agency remained at the site of the old fort, tearing down many buildings and erecting others, until 1924, when it was moved to Toppenish.

It's a pleasant, scenic drive down highway 97 from Toppenish, through Satus pass, to the Columbia river, and for Oregonians it's the shortest way home.

Motorloggers in white AAA car found curio shop in an Indian tepee at army fort.
