ROSY SAYS: I see by my paper where the senate has passed an amendment to the farm bill to pay the farmers 100% parity for wheat used for human consumption. I suppose that would include the wheat used to make alcohol if the consumers drink it. I have been advocating paying the farmer $3.00 a bushel for wheat for a long time. He would be willing to cut production to take care of the storage problem if he received enough cash to pay his bills and buy a new Ford. P. S. The Mercury Drive-away-Sale is now going on.

Ways of Improving Child's Spelling Given for Parents OREGON STATE COLLEGE—Parents can help their children spell better by putting correct spelling in the home on the same basis as proper table manners. Mrs. Faith G. Norris, assistant professor of English at Oregon State college, says parents could go a long way toward improving a child's spelling by encouraging them to realize its importance. Help your children become aware of words, advises Mrs. Norris, and when they misspell a word show them the right way. Mrs. Norris, who has taught two spelling clinics at OSC for students who wanted to improve their spelling, found that many college men and women can't spell many of the words they learned in their early school days. However, they have little trouble with the more difficult words learned later. The OSC professor suggests several do's and don'ts for help-ing children. First, she says, the parent should consult the teacher to find how they can best help their child.

Mrs. Norris suggests making up games to aid children in learning to spell. Make it fun. You can keep the children out of mischief and improve their spell-ing by making up spelling games while on long automobile trips, she advises parents. Don't nag or fuss if the child misspells a word, she cautions. Some children rebel if the parent tries to force them into spelling and they adopt the attitude of purposely not spelling correctly. Do help the child to pronounce correctly. Mrs. Norris says that much poor spelling comes from a sloppy habit of pronunciation. For instance, she finds that many students pronounce convenience and con-vi-ence, and they spell it the latter way. Athlete is often spelled ath-e-lete because it is pronounced with an extra "e".
