Principals, Grads List High School Helps For College

OREGON STATE COLLEGE—One of the big reasons why college students have scholastic problems is that they have failed in high school to take full advantage of opportunities to prepare for college—both in the courses they take and in the way they "study."

This is one of the interesting observations made by Oregon high school principals during the past four years in a series of individual interviews made at Oregon State college with their former students.

Decision on the part of the student about "whether or not I want to attend college" is a contributing factor, the students report. Sometimes the choice is delayed so long that some of the valuable college preparatory courses are missed.

Sometimes too, students "shy away" from the preparatory courses because they are "tougher" than some electives. In college, students realize this mistake.

Students who are "college bound" or seriously considering going to college are urged to take advantage of all the courses—such as English, mathematics, and science—that will help them prepare for college work.

On the basis of the interview findings during the past four years, some high schools have expanded their offerings to include additional preparatory courses. Others are putting extra stress on helping pupils better learn "how to really study". Washington high school in Portland, for example, is emphasizing senior English for those who want to go to college instead of letting them take electives. Forest Grove attempts to put college-inclined students into a directed course of study in their sophomore year.

Seaside high school, which participated in the interviews for the first time this year, plans to offer a new senior mathematics course and place added emphasis on science courses.

The principals interviewed, organized by the student personnel department at OSC in 1952, have proved valuable to both the college and to the high schools participating.

Students comments on their progress and problems in college are used by OSC in improving its new student orientation week and counseling problems and in helping the new student "get off on the right foot."

High schools are finding the interviews useful in determining strong and weak points in their college preparatory programs and in their student guidance work. Eight students participated in the interviews the first year but the number has steadily increased since then. Thirty-five schools were represented at the February talks this year.
