Farmer Efforts To Solve Own Problems Noted

Farmers are doing much to solve their own problems, believes Mrs. Elvera Horrell, extension agricultural economist at Oregon State college.
They are applying know-how gained through research and are shifting crops and emphasizing livestock in their effort to balance production against the needs being expressed by city people in the markets of the nation, she points out.
Farmers know that prosperity cannot be legislated, Mrs. Horrell says. But they do ask for understanding through sound farm policies—for farmers and their city customers.
The stake in the farm problem is larger than many people realize, Mrs. Horrell believes. Farmers are heavy users of industrial products to produce the food and the fiber used by the nation, and much of this food and fiber is used as raw materials by industry.
Farm products create many jobs for city people other than in industry, the economist explains. Figures point up that there are more people working at marketing farm products than there are people growing them.
Oregon people are especially close to the land, Mrs. Horrell says. Farming is the second greatest source of Oregon's primary income, even though only about one person out of every seven in the state lives on a farm. Oregon counties rank high in the agriculture of the nation, with 11 counties listed in at least one farm product among the top 10 in the nation.
But many of the state's farmers have been having a nip and tuck battle with buying power in recent years, Mrs. Horrell reports. Prices that farmers receive have gone down while prices of goods and services they buy have stayed high.
