digestive tract of farm animals. Cows fed 6 lbs. daily of screenings containing 212,912 weed seeds per pound passed 640,000 whole seeds daily. Some of the seeds actually germinated better after passing through the digestive tract. The affect of digestion on the viability of weed seeds varied with the kind of animal. Ranked to percentage of viable seeds passed, calves led the list, followed by hogs, horses, sheep, and chickens in that order. Cattle fed weed seeds will pass viable seeds for at least a week after they have been removed from the source of seeds. Greg pointed out that most weed seeds have a rather high chemical analysis, especially protein and fat. This is not a total indication of feeding value, since many weed seeds have a bitter taste, or cannot be easily ground to a fineness which makes them more palatable. Palatability in these cases is more important than total digestible fiber, and were very low in digestible nitrogen-free extract.

Greg summed up the subject of whether screenings were a good feed or a source of weed infestation as follows: "While screenings offer some nutritional value as livestock feed, this value is more than offset by the danger of planting weed seeds unless they are properly processed. In buying feed screenings, buy only cleaned screenings on the basis of reliable samples and consider the composition of the screenings, their palatability and wholesomeness, fineness of grinding or the method of devitalization of weed seeds."
