Wrong State Wayne Morse

Oregon's senior senator, Wayne L. Morse, is maintaining his reputation for being consistently inconsistent when he now refuses to work for a reservation of a block of federal power to Oregon from John Day and other proposed new federal dams.

In his letter to "Fellow Oregonians" dated December 14, 1956, Senator Morse wrote: "Both private utilities and public agencies must be assured of an adequate supply of power from all sources—federal and their own. Private utilities should be guaranteed a fair share of power supply from new federal projects."

In his several bills calling for construction of a high federal dam in Hells Canyon of the Snake river, Senator Morse included a reservation for 500,000 kilowatts of power primarily for the state of Idaho. He does not argue, for Hells Canyon, as in the matter of an allocation of John Day power to Oregon, that a "fair and equitable" apportionment plan "would impair collaboration of the Oregon delegation with congressional delegations of other Pacific Northwest states in the fight for Columbia basin development."

Senator Morse went along with a provision in the act under which Hungry Horse dam in Montana was constructed by the federal government.

This reserved power from the dam for Montana consumers—specifically Montana Power and Light, Pacific Power and Light, and Anaconda Aluminum companies and Victor Chemical works.

But now that projections show that by 1965 all federal power in a minimum water year will be withdrawn from Oregon private utilities to meet the demands of Washington public power agencies. Senator Morse has a very different answer for his own state, or rather the state which he is supposed to be representing.

Oregon, the senior senator says, should change its laws to permit easier creation of preference utilities—i. e., public power agencies. To get a fair and equitable share of the energy generated by a regional system created by the federal government, in Morse's view, Oregon must go whole-hog for public power distribution.

Unless Oregon submits to the public power movement, Senator Morse is perfectly willing to just sit back and allow 85 per cent of Oregon electric customers to be deprived of federal low-cost power. Unless Oregon goes public power, Senator Morse is agreeable to seeing 80 per cent of the federal supply from a "regional" system go to the state of Washington preference consumers. It now looks as if Senator Morse is representing the wrong state—at least, not the state of Oregon. —(Blue Mountain Eagle, John Day.)
