24 Projects Open This Fall to 4-H Members of State
Oregon boys and girls who enroll in a 4-H club, this fall can participate in a record 24 different projects, according to a new 4-H club project handbook recently revised at Oregon State college.

Projects are in agriculture, home economics, creative arts and leadership. They include beekeeping, electricity, entomology, field crops, food preservation, foods, forestry, horticulture, livestock, marketing, knitting, tractor, poultry, wildlife and woodworking. Others listed in "Oregon 4-H Club Project Handbook" are child care, clothing for boys, clothing for girls, health, home living, outdoor cooking, photography, junior leadership and creative arts.

Purpose of the handbook is to help parents and leaders of club members learn more about the 4-H program, says Burton Hutton, state 4-H club extension leader. More than 2,000 adult volunteer leaders now lead the 29,000 youngsters enrolled in Oregon clubs.

Requirements for youngsters who want to belong to clubs are listed in the handbook. Any boy or girl who is at least nine years old—but under 21—may become a 4-H club member. Agricultural extension offices in all counties and the City of Portland 4-H club office are centers for 4-H club information.

Club members enroll in one or more 4-H projects, attend regular meetings where they demonstrate skills learned, and keep records of their projects. They are also encouraged to exhibit accomplishments at public shows, fairs and achievement days.

The 4-H clubs provide opportunities for boys and girls in rural, suburban and urban areas to join together under the 4-H standards—Head, heart, hands and health—to develop skills of the mind and hand, the bulletin points out.

How to Judge, Manage Soil Outlined by OSC
No one expects to pick popcorn from prune trees or to market pork chops from black Angus, but the impossible is often expected of the soil, according to two Oregon State college soil men who are authors of a new bulletin designed to help Oregonians make best use of their wide ranges of soil types.

Published by Oregon State college extension service, the 32-page booklet, "Soil Judging From the Ground Up", was prepared by Arthur S. King, conservation specialist, and Murry Dawson, soil specialist. Copies may be obtained free from county extension offices or the OSC bulletin clerk, Corvallis.
