Bumble Bees Fade Away in Oregon; Crop Value Noted
 OREGON STATE COLLEGE—The colorful and valuable bumble bees that once were among the state's leading crop pollinators before wide-spread use of chemical sprays are now disappearing from some sections of Oregon and Western America, according to an Oregon State college entomologist's study of the king-sized bee.
 Dr W P Stephen has found bumble bees all but gone from intensive farming areas where sprays are used constantly to check destructive pests.

 Some still remain along the coast and in other sections of open land where their ground nests are not exposed to sprays. In those areas, they are particularly useful as pollinators of cranberries, blueberries, and red clover. They are more effective than honey bees on red clover and blueberries and honey bees do not like the cool, wet conditions under which cranberries grow.

While the decline of the bumble bee can't be helped or halted, it can be "lamented," Stephen said, and every attempt made to check indiscriminate spraying that uselessly kills off wild bees. Honey bees are protected by moving them in and out of spray areas, he noted.

Stephen recently published a technical bulletin on bumble bees of Western America and has been given a $9,500 grant by the National Science Foundation to continue work for another three years. He plans eventually to compile data on bumble bees of the world.

The thing that makes some bumble bees particularly effective as pollinators is their long tongues, Stephens said. The three-jointed tongue is sometimes as long as the bee's body and twice as long as the tongue of the honey bee.

Twenty-four species of bumblebees are found in Oregon. Deserted mice nests are favorite homes for the bees and the big build-up in mice this year may mean more bumble bees next summer, Stephen believes. All but new queen bumble bees die with the first frost each fall. The queen overwinters and builds the colony.

Bumble bees vary greatly in behavior and color. Some are vicious, others docile. Unlike the honey bee, the bumble bee can sting more than once. In Oregon, they are mostly yellow and black.

Good Grapefruit Deserve Good Knives

The citrus fruit in your local market is sure to be good and you need not worry about damage from the recent cold snap in Florida. The State withheld all shipments until affected fruit could be recognized and destroyed.

You'll find fixing Florida grapefruit halves or sectioning the whole fruit for use in salads and fruit cups really a cinch if you use the right tools for the task—good sharp paring knives. Experts seem to agree on a short, straight bladed knife for separating the fruit from the dividing membranes in halves. If you like the seeded fruit (and many people prefer it) but not the chore of removing the seeds, cut around the seeds, removing them with the core from the center.

To section the whole fruit, peel like an apple, and then cut from the outside down to the core with a knife blade about 5 or 6 inches long; slip out section by pulling knife back along next membrane. Grapefruit is at its peak of quality right now, and makes a wonderful first or last course—sensible because it has a good low calorie count, and because it provides lots of vitamin C, needed daily to help prevent colds and infections such as the Asian Flu.
