Fringe Area Study For Oregon Shows Problems, Progress

OREGON STATE COLLEGE—Most persons are satisfied with the services provided by the patchwork of special districts of urban fringe areas.

That's the conclusion of Dr Russell Maddox, Oregon State college political science professor, who has made a study of the problems and prospects of the urban fringe in Oregon. An interim committee was appointed by the 1955 Oregon legislature to study problems of urban fringe areas. Within the Portland urban area alone, the committee found, there were 187 active, independent units of local government. In seven other areas studied, 93 such governmental units were discovered.

"People are familiar with the results of this arrangement, and they prefer to live with these results rather than risk unknown consequences of new and different systems," Maddox reported.

Serious problems will probably be handled in the future as they have in the past—slowly and haltingly—but at the same time as swiftly as the bulk of the people demand, he said. With the exception of school districts, the most widely encountered special districts provided water, fire protection, sanitation, and highway lighting, in that order. This order is significant, Dr Maddox said, because it reflects a characteristic of suburban areas. That is, that needs commonly develop and find expression in action by residents "one at a time."

Other districts are for zoning drainage, parks and recreational facilities, cemeteries, hospitals and irrigation. The major municipal service not provided anywhere by a special district is police protection, a function not authorized by law. Most police protection in urban fringe areas is considered totally inadequate by city standards, Maddox emphasized.

Oregon was the fifth fastest growing state between 1940 and 1950 with a 39.6 percent increase compared to 14.5 percent for the nation. One noteworthy feature of Oregon's growth has been its concentration in areas immediately surrounding cities, where growth has been almost four times as rapid as in the cities themselves. Because of this, local governments have faced serious problems in efforts to provide needed services to inhabitants of these fringe areas, Maddox said.
