Oregon Farm Prices Dip Slightly but U S Average Gains

Oregon farm prices turned downward last month in contrast to national farm prices which continued to rise according to Mrs Elvera Horrell, extension agricultural economist at Oregon State college.

Lower livestock prices in the state during April more than offset a slight rise in crop prices paid farmers, Mrs Horrell said. Milk, beef cattle, hog, lamb, and wool prices slipped during the month and helped lower the price index. It marked the first drop in meat-animal prices in the state since October.

However crop prices inched up a little during April, largely due to increases in prices paid farmers for corn and potatoes. This helped Oregon farm prices stay about 3 percent above those of a year earlier, although they stand about 1 percent below last month.

On the national scene, record high prices for fruits and vegetables, and substantial increase in prices paid for cotton, gave the national farm price index another monthly boost. Prices received by the nation's farmers gained 1 percent during last month and now stand 10 percent above April, 1957 and at the highest level since January, 1953, Mrs Horrell said.

Prices of things farmers buy also moved up 1 percent last month to a new record high, 6 percent above a year earlier. Prices paid for farm production items were responsible for the increase, as higher prices for bred cattle, feed, baby chicks, and turkey poulters more than offset slightly lower prices for feeder lambs, building materials, and fertilizer.

Farm family living items held unchanged from previous record high in mid-March as a rise in food prices was balanced by unchanged or lower prices on other items.

With both prices received and prices paid by farmers advanced a like amount, farm product purchasing power held its own at mid-April, Mrs Horrell said. The parity ratio—the government's yardstick for measuring the relationship between prices received and prices paid by farmers—stood at 87 at mid-April, unchanged from mid-March but 5 points above mid-April, 1957.

Compost Pile Rated Handy Garden Aid; Suggestions Listed

Those lush clippings you've been mowing off your lawn can help you grow better flowers and garden crops next year if you throw them on a compost pile now, advises R Ralph Clark, extension horticulturist at Oregon State college.

Garden and landscape plants thrive in soil containing lots of organic material, Clark explains. The organic matter helps hold moisture and plant food in the soil, and makes it easier for plant roots to develop naturally. In city or suburban gardens where large quantities of manure are difficult to obtain, a compost pile can supply much of this needed organic material. Grass clippings, leaves, weeds, and even vegetable parings and fruit peels will all break down into valuable organic matter when properly composted. To make a compost pile, you first spread a 5 or 6-inch layer of clippings and other material on the ground, add a thin layer of manure or throw on a few handfuls of high-nitrogen fertilizer, and then cover with 1 or 2 inches of soil, Clark says. Continue to build up additional layers over a period of time until the pile is about 3 feet high, ending with a layer of soil.

Sides of the pile should be kept vertical, with the top kept level or slightly dipped to catch and hold moisture. In dry seasons, it's wise to sprinkle the pile to keep it moist. This hastens decomposition of the clippings and other materials. The compost pile you build this year will be ready for use next year, Clark says. To use the compost, spread and work into the garden soil, or use as a side-dressing or mulch around plants. For a constant supply, many gardeners have two compost piles, using one while building the other for use next year.

More information about making and using compost can be found in an OSC extension circular, "Composts for Garden Soil". Oregon residents can get a copy at their county extension office, or from the OSC bulletin clerk, Corvallis.

Vehicle Defects Figure in Accidents

Vehicle defects have figured in several fatal traffic accidents in Oregon so far this year, giving emphasis to the need for the May vehicle safety check program being conducted in at least 17 Oregon cities.

Faulty headlights or improperly aimed headlights figured in four traffic deaths, three of them in one accident; and a tire blow-out was involved in another death.

Last year, according to figures from the Oregon Traffic Safety Commission, 1243 vehicle defects were noted in the 61,864 traffic accidents in the state.

Car owners, the commission said, should take advantage of check lanes being operated by civic groups in the city or, if no check lanes are not being planned, should have their cars checked by their garagemen.

Such checks are especially needed before any long weekend or vacation trips are made, officials said.
