Oregon Weed Study Set For Field Day

Public enemies No 1, 2, and 3 among Oregon weeds have been identified in a recent survey of Oregon county extension agents.

Agents put the finger on Canada thistle, wild morning glory, and tansy ragwort as the most persistent weed parasites operating against Oregon farm crops. The first two pests will get major attention at an Oregon State college weed field day, June 6, near Corvallis.

The field day starts at 9:30 am at the OSC Hyslop experimental midway between Corvallis and Albany just off Highway 20.

William Furtick and David Chilcote, OSC researchers, will report methods of getting 90 to 95 percent control of Canada thistle with the new chemical ATA, using 8 pounds per acre of the commercial product. The weed was reported a major pest in 22 Oregon counties.

Wild morning glory was listed a menace in 17 counties, mostly in the Columbia Basin. Control is still in the experimental stage with field trials throughout Oregon using a new herbicide of the chloro benzoic acid family. Furtick will give a progress report.

Tansy ragwort is running wild in 12 Oregon counties, mainly in the coastal area—but needlessly—the researchers say. Early June spraying with 2, 4-D ester before the weed blooms will give excellent control.

Hard-to-control quackgrass was named among the three most troublesome weeds in eight counties, and Russian thistle ranked high in seven counties. White top and gorse also rated the "most unwanted" list as worst pests in three counties.

Other weed problems scheduled for review at the field day include use of new chemicals—some just coming on the market this year—for "selective control" of weeds in clover, corn, and cereal crops.

New research findings for chemical control of weeds in strawberry fields also will be reported.

Training Schools For Youths Set At OSC

Nearly 2,800 Oregon youths will participate in summer training programs at Oregon State college during the week of June 15.

The 22nd annual Beaver Boys State, a one-week citizenship training program sponsored by the American Legion, will attract a record 500 high school boys.

The third annual Junior Engineers and Scientists Summer Institute (JESSI), scheduled June 15 to 28, is being expanded this year to include nearly 300 high school boys from throughout the Northwest.

The Oregon 4-H club Summer School, one of the largest programs of its kind in the nation, will bring nearly 2,000 club members and their leaders to the campus, June 16 to 22.

All of the 500 boys who attend Beaver Boys State are sponsored by local organizations. As part of their citizenship training, elections are held to determine city, county and state officials and each boy attending holds an office. State officials will be installed at special ceremonies at the state capitol in Salem.

Oregon's highly successful JESSI program is designed to give students a concentrated orientation on careers and study programs in engineering and science. Course work covers all phases of engineering and mathematics, physics, chemistry, zoology, geology, bacteriology, botany and astronomy.

Nearly 50,000 class hours will be devoted by girls and boys attending the 4-H club school to work in agriculture, home economics, recreation, and health. Special assemblies and activities are scheduled each day.
