Food Buying Trends Outlined At OSC

Consumers are buying more food, paying more for it, eating more meals in restaurants, and enjoying more marketing services than ever before, according to Mrs Elvira Horrell, Oregon State college economist.

Some of the reasons that people are spending more for food and services are explained by Mrs Horrell. Retail food prices are up, she says, because both farm prices and marketing charges have increased in the past year. People also have more money, are willing to spend more for extra services, and enjoy the luxury of eating more meals in restaurants.

Although food costs are higher today, people are spending about a fourth of their incomes for food, the same as in other recent years. However, Mrs Horrell points out, if shoppers bought only the same amounts and types of food as those 1935 to 1939, each person's food bill would amount to only 16 percent of his disposable income.

As incomes increase, people usually buy more expensive foods, and more convenience in the form of processed, prepared foods.

A smaller share of food is being produced at home nowadays as people depend more on store-purchased items, she says. A department of agriculture survey shows that 18 percent of the food used was home-produced in 1942, compared with only 8 percent in 1955.

Behind higher retail food prices are increases in both farm prices and marketing charges, Mrs Horrell reports. Higher prices on livestock, fresh fruits and vegetables have pushed farm prices higher. The boost in marketing charges is due mostly to the higher cost of assembling, processing and distributing farm-food products.

Infestations of bindweed (creeping jenny) like this can take over if left uncontrolled. Millions of dollars are lost each year from noxious weeds, which can now be controlled with new Du Pont Tryben 200, trademark.

NOW... control bindweed and other noxious weeds and vines with new Du Pont TRYBEN 200 WEED KILLER

Du Pont "Tryben" 200 is a new weed killer that gives excellent, economical control of such perennial weeds as field bindweed (creeping jenny), leafy spurge, Canada thistle, Russian knapweed and burragweed. "Tryben" 200—a liquid to be diluted with water for use as a spray—also controls a wide range of perennial and annual broadleaf weeds, as well as woody vines, such as trumpet vine and brush.

Many successful trials of new "Tryben" 200 have been made in states where deep-rooted perennial weeds are a problem. These trials show that "Tryben" 200 will keep roadsides, rights-of-way and fence rows free of noxious weeds that have been difficult to kill with other chemicals... and also prevent them from spreading into cultivated fields.
