care of damage or wilting. When cutting remember that in all classes evidence of insect pests or disease or of spray or dust damage or residue is judged as a fault.

In general, always cut flowers before they reach full bloom. Glads are cut when the first florie open, roses in the bud etc, but handling of special varieties will be treated in a later article. Stems should be cut long, and generally in proportion to the size of the flower head. Flowers should be cut no later than the day before they are to be exhibited, and cutting should be done in the early morning or after the sun goes down. Cut stems cleanly at an angle with the sharpest knife you can find, not scissors, and place at once in deep tepid water. Flowers take up warm water more rapidly than cold. Chrysanthemums and other woody stem varieties should be slit or crushed about three inches on the stem, while tips of dahlias and other hollow stem plants should be held in boiling water one to three minutes. Blooms having stems with milk juices such as poppies and flowers with hairy stems such as zinnias keep better when stem tips are seared over a flame as soon as cut.

Place the flowers in deep water in a dark cool place away from drafts over night or about 12 hours. Flowers "hardened" in this way hold their freshness for some time, and receive merit for good condition when judged.

Beautiful blooms may be crushed, bruised or torn in transit to the show unless carefully packed and carried. Most flowers are carried safely in flat boxes large enough to avoid crowding if the heads are supported by placing rolls of waxed paper under the stems just below the flower heads. Perishable specimens may be transported in water if placed in an upright position not touching each other and given ample room in the pail or container. Smart exhibitors carry more blooms than the schedule requires just to be
