Irradiated Foods Tested at OSC; Grants Received
 OREGON STATE COLLEGE—Tests on whether irradiated foods are wholesome and safe to eat will be extended into the sixth year at Oregon State college this winter with a new $28,750 grant from the office of the surgeon general department of the army.
 White rats are used as test animals. They are being fed pork, peaches, carrots and jam irradiated for preservation at the Idaho Falls, Ida, atomic energy installation.
 Irradiated foods will keep for vastly longer periods than others and do not require refrigeration. They show considerable promise for military and home use in the future.
 To date in the OSC tests, no differences whatever have been found between rats on irradiated and non-irradiated diets. Length of life, weight gains, body tissue composition, and number of offspring are compared. Dr Edward C Publ, agricultural chemist, is leader of the project. Since it was started in 1954, OSC has received grants totaling more than $200,000 for the tests.
