Animal Industry Meet To Stress Feed Efficiency
 Ways to feed livestock and poultry more efficiently in today's highly mechanized agriculture will be spotlighted at the 17th annual Animal Industry Conference, scheduled January 29 and 30 on the Oregon State College campus.
 The annual conference, co-sponsored by the Oregon Feed and Seed Dealers association and OSC, will examine ways to tie supplements in prepared feeds to total energy level of the feed rather than body weight of individual animals, reports Dr J E Oldfield, OSC animal husbandman who is program chairman.
 Need for this technique is a rather logical outgrowth of the movement of automation into animal agriculture, the program committee pointed out. Individual feeding is becoming increasingly difficult as larger and larger herds and flocks are handled by farmers, it was explained.
 Out-of-state speakers at the two-day conference will include Dr Fred Hill, poultry nutritionist at Cornell University, and Dr A J Wood, animal nutritionist at the University of British Columbia.
 Dr C A Bottoroff of the American Cynamid company, Pearl River, N Y, will outline future trends of research in the feed industry, and discuss recent developments in poultry and turkey diseases.
 OSC staff members will also present papers at the conference, reporting on research at the OSC agricultural experiment station.
 All interested persons are welcome to attend conference sessions, Oldfield said. Meetings will be held in Withycombe hall auditorium at OSC.
