EARTHQUAKES IN THE NEWS—
OREGON'S HAD 'EM TOO!

OREGON STATE COLLEGE— Earthquake-wise, Oregon has survived this Centennial year with just taking shocks coming from earth shifts originating in neighboring states.

But, during the past century, Oregon has had an interesting history of earth quivers.

Dr Harold R Vinyard, Oregon State College professor of physics and seismologist, said scientist speak of Oregon as being "screened" by geologic conditions that modify arriving earthquake waves and take the "sting out of them."

Oregon's relative immunity, however, is not necessarily permanent, he warns.

The Seismological Society of America has 82 earthquake notations for Oregon between 1846 and 1928. But some of the early shocks printed in newspapers were later found to be "noticed" by persons who were "seeking diversion and amusement during the dull winter months" and who had a fertile imagination.

One of the earliest earthquakes of any intensity was recorded on Nov 22, 1873. The shock was felt from Portland to San Francisco, Calif, with the severest damage at Crescent City, Calif, and Port Orford.

Chimneys were damaged in the interior as far as Jacksonville. Most shocks felt by Oregon residents originate in Idaho, California, Nevada, Washington, Vancouver Island, B. C. and Montana, scene of the Yellowstone Park disaster this August.

Although no active earth faults are now located in Oregon, one comes close in the north and another hovers off the southwestern coast.

A major fault stretches from Puget Sound basin to Alaska and another, the famous San Andreas fault which caused the San Francisco havoc in 1906, has its northerly tip some 80 miles at sea off the Oregon-California border.

The great San Francisco earthquake on April 18, 1906, was felt by a few people in several places in southern Oregon. According to the report of the state earthquake investigation commission, Coquille was the most northerly point which felt the shock.

Up to that time, "the most severe earthquake ever felt in Portland" was on Feb 3, 1892, at 8:30 p. m. "Brick buildings swayed and windows rattled, terrifying the inmates, who in many instances rushed into the street. The shock lasted about 30 seconds" another notation reads.

Then, as now, the natural tendency of people to rush out-of-doors at the first sign of a quake is the most disastrous, Dr Vinyard said. They usually get outside just in time to meet a shower of chimney bricks or building ledges. The safest place is the nearest inside wall or inside doorway.

During the 1846 to 1928 period, the Stanfield-Hermiston-Pendleton area came in for several mentions in the earthquake catalog. A Hermiston quake on Oct 15, 1922, was noted as "Three shocks, of three, three, and one seconds duration. Felt by several."

On Oct 2, 1915, an earthquake was listed for Baker, La Grande and Ontario. "People frightened and hurriedly left hotels. This was the destructive shock which originated in Pleasant Valley, Nev."

Newspaper dispatches of Aug 26 1896 reported the narrow escape of a party of tourists on Mt Hood from an avalanche. The stories conveyed the impression of a volcanic eruption, but it is believed an earthquake may have caused the avalanche.

The Geological News Letter reports a Portland earthquake of Nov 12, 1939, originating from the Mt Si fault near North Bend, Wash: "Damage to the Portland area was confined to mental anguish' of those who were conscious of the quake, and a few broken bric-a-brac. Police and newspaper offices were swamped with telephone calls that ranged from wild demands for protection from burglars to 'what was it?'"

Although a scientific instrument such as the Oregon State College seismograph is now used to record the intensity of earthquakes, description of damage done still follows the diary-type phrases used in the early days.

On the Mercalli Scale for earthquakes the main difference between a 6 and 7 intensity earthquake is that when a 6 quake hits "many are frightened and run outdoors" and with a 7, "everybody runs outdoors."
