OSC Bulletin Gives Hints for Managing Oregon Trout Ponds Good news for Oregon trout fishermen—the more they fish, the better trout they'll catch. At least this holds true for farm trout ponds. This suggestion is one of many offered by Andrew S. Landfore, Oregon State College extension wildlife management specialist, in a new Oregon State College publication, "Managing Oregon Trout Ponds." Spring is the logical time to buy trout for stocking farm ponds, the bulletin suggests, since this is the season when fish are most likely available from private growers. Trout won't thrive in all farm ponds, Landfore points out. To grow trout year after year, a pond should have steep, deep sides, a dependable supply of controllable clean water, a screened overflow or outlet, a minimum depth of 10 feet, and an adequate draining system. Best water temperatures for rainbow trout are 56 to 65 degrees. How large a pond? The bulletin notes that ponds as small as one-third acre and 6 feet deep have produced trout fishing in Oregon. However, one-acre ponds produce more satisfactorily year-round family fishing. Ponds much larger than three acres can grow more trout than most families and their friends can catch and use. The bulletin answers questions about how many trout to stock, pond fertilizer, draining the pond, and legal considerations. Phone your news items to 6-9228.
