Why there's plenty of electricity wherever you go

You feel like a pioneer as you pitch camp in the pines, and drop your fishing line in some secluded spot. You're roughing it, but not enough to spoil your fun. For today wherever you roam, rural electric lines supply the conveniences of home.

Electrification of remote areas like this was long delayed. Rural people were widely scattered — supposedly too costly to reach with electricity. Then came the Rural Electrification Administration, and rural Americans organized non-profit groups, borrowed money from the REA, and built their own power lines.

These rural electricies have agreed to serve everyone near or far, big or small — at lowest possible cost. At the same time, they've been prevented by law from serving towns of over 1,500, and people already being served. But despite these handicaps, in only 25 years, rural electric systems have built 1.5 million miles of line and today serve 16 million rural Americans.

Best of all, the cost of rural electrification is borne by the people who use it. And already 1,000 rural electricies — mostly cooperatives — have paid over $1 billion in principal and interest on their $3½ billion REA loans — added proof this is one of the best investments our Nation has ever made.
