Hood Appointed To Extension Job

By DELPHA JONES

(Held over from last week)
 Oregon State University today announced appointment of Gordon Hood as assistant director of its statewide cooperative extension service.

Hood will supervise programs of OSU extension specialists in agricultural production and will have key responsibilities for operations of county extension offices in all counties of Oregon, announced F. E. Price, OSU dean of agriculture.

The new assistant director fills a staff vacancy created by the recent retirement of C. W. Smith, an agricultural leader in the state and extension staff member for 35 years.

Extension service is the off-campus teaching arm of OSU school of agriculture and home economics, responsible for taking research findings and other educational programs to communities of the state.

In addition to its program for adults in agriculture, family living, and related subjects, extension service conducts the statewide 4-H club program through its county extension offices. Hood will have major responsibilities for policies and procedures relating to budgets, personnel, and office management of the county offices throughout the state.

Hood has been with extension service since 1945, starting as Clatsop county agent and coming to OSU as a state extension agent in 1951. As state
