Feedlot Building Told in Bulletin

You don't have to be a professional engineer to build and mechanize a feedlot. But it helps to have the advice of one, because feedlot mechanization requires use of several engineered systems: Livestock handling, feed distribution and feed processing.

All of these systems should be engineered for best possible coordination, say experts. And if the feedlot is on a farm, it should be engineered to fit into the overall farm operation.

A bulletin written by an agricultural engineer tells how to build and mechanize a feedlot, how to coordinate its operations and how to fit it into other farm activities.

Free copies of "Your Feedlot" are available to Oregon residents at county extension offices or from OSU bulletin clerk, Corvallis.
