Leaf-Cutter Bees Prove Valuable, Bulletin Reports

Like a perplexed home owner in a modern suburban subdivision where the houses all look alike, a leaf-cutter bee in an alfalfa field sometimes gets confused in finding his home unless it's painted a distinctive color.

This is but one of several observations Oregon State University entomologist Dr. William P. Stephen reports in a new bulletin, "Propagation of the Leaf-Cutter Bee for Alfalfa Seed Production."

Since the leaf-cutter bee was first reported in Oregon in 1958, it has proved a valuable alfalfa pollinator. But it needs help to do its job most efficiently, Stephen points out.

For instance, a grower can control time of bee emergence to correlate with peak alfalfa bloom. The entomologist explained that bees can be induced to emerge earlier if overwintering pre-pupae are located in a heated area and exposed to limited direct sunlight. Similarly, emergence of overwintering bees can be delayed by placing nesting sites in protected or refrigerated places.

Location of nesting sites also can determine whether one or two generations of bees appear each year.

Leaf-cutter bees will nest in a variety of situations: milk straws, corrugated cardboard, holes bored in wood, hollow rubber and metal tubing, stems of pithy plants, etc. The bulletin offers suggestions for building different types of man-made domiciles and field stations to provide shade and protection for the nesting bees.

It also suggests ways to control beetles, ants and earwigs, all common enemies of the leaf-cutter bee.

Free copies of the bulletin are available to Oregon residents from county extension offices or from OSU Bulletin Clerk, Corvallis.
